During the development of a new drug product, detailed chemical studies must be made of raw materials, synthetic intermediates, the drug substance itself, and the final formulated product. These studies must identify types and levels of impurities, degradation products, degradation rates, and analytical methods suitable for monitoring these factors. The information resulting from these studies is used to identify potential sources of safety problems in the product, to meet the requirements of foreign and domestic regulatory agencies, and as a basis for establishing quality control procedures and specifications for the product. The analytical effort required to provide this information can be divided into a number of tasks. The requirements for specificity, precision, accuracy, and the degree of complexity acceptable in the analytical procedure vary considerably from task to task and therefore require a variety of analytical techniques to satisfy them. The set of analytical procedures developed to control the quality of the final marketed product must include both qualitative and quantitative methods in order to assure the identity and purity of the product. Several categories of tests are usually included in a product specification.
